

Green Universe: a Microscopic Voyage into the Plant Cell.

Author: Baskin, Tobias I.

Source: BioScience, 63(6) : 502-503

Published By: American Institute of Biological Sciences

URL: <https://doi.org/10.1525/bio.2013.63.6.14>

BioOne Complete (complete.BioOne.org) is a full-text database of 200 subscribed and open-access titles in the biological, ecological, and environmental sciences published by nonprofit societies, associations, museums, institutions, and presses.

Your use of this PDF, the BioOne Complete website, and all posted and associated content indicates your acceptance of BioOne's Terms of Use, available at www.bioone.org/terms-of-use.

Usage of BioOne Complete content is strictly limited to personal, educational, and non - commercial use. Commercial inquiries or rights and permissions requests should be directed to the individual publisher as copyright holder.

BioOne sees sustainable scholarly publishing as an inherently collaborative enterprise connecting authors, nonprofit publishers, academic institutions, research libraries, and research funders in the common goal of maximizing access to critical research.

- Smith CH, ed. 1991. Alfred Russel Wallace: An Anthology of His Shorter Writings. Oxford University Press.
- Smith CH, Beccaloni G. 2010. Natural Selection and Beyond: The Intellectual Legacy of Alfred Russel Wallace. Oxford University Press.
- Wallace AR. 1869. The Malay Archipelago: The Land of the Orang-utan, and the Bird of Paradise: A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. Macmillan.
- . 1876. The Geographical Distribution of Animals: With a Study of the Relations of Living and Extinct Faunas as Elucidating the Past Changes of the Earth's Surface. Macmillan.
- . 1889. Darwinism: An Exposition of the Theory of Natural Selection with Some of Its Applications. Macmillan.
- . 1905. My Life: A Record of Events and Opinions. Dodd, Mead, and Company.

TIM M. BERRA

Tim M. Berra (berra.1@osu.edu) is a university professorial fellow at Charles Darwin University, in Darwin, Australia, and professor emeritus in the Department of Evolution, Ecology, and Organismal Biology at The Ohio State University, in Mansfield. Berra is the author of Charles Darwin: The Concise Story of an Extraordinary Man (2009) and the upcoming Darwin and His Children: His Other Legacy.

PLANT PORN

Green Universe: A Microscopic Voyage into the Plant Cell. Stephen Blackmore. Papadakis Publisher, 2012. 256 pp., illus. $60.00 (ISBN 9781906506216 cloth).

Green Universe: A Microscopic Voyage into the Plant Cell presents a panoramic overview of the morphology and anatomy of the plant kingdom, from algae to angiosperms. The format is large (the volume measures 25 × 25 square centimeters), the pages are black and shiny, and the photographs are splashy. Some photos span an entire spread; others take up a full page. Flipping through the pages of this book, anyone with a coffee table will be intrigued and impressed by the intricacy and splendor of plants.

Author Stephen Blackmore, regius keeper of the Royal Botanic Garden

Edinburgh, is an accomplished botanist and palynologist who has published both scientific monographs and generalist books. The latter range from field guides to a manual for sustainable gardening. For Green Universe, he took many of the photographs himself. The book's images are mainly of three kinds: macroscopic images of whole plants or organs, micrographs of cells or tissues taken with a scanning electron microscope, and light micrographs of prepared slides. Each image has a cursory caption identifying the species and stating a salient fact.

As the book's subtitle suggests, micrographs (both light and electron) are its cynosure. Of them, the scanning electron micrographs are original and uniformly stunning. As a researcher, Blackmore was an early adopter of the scanning electron microscope in biology and has used it incisively. Arguably, these micrographs are worth the cost of the book. The nonmicroscopic photographs, although they are typically of more familiar subjects (e.g., leaves or flowers), provide context and have been taken with sensitivity and grace. However, the light micrographs, although they display the layout of cell walls within an organ strikingly, often show a shriveled cytoplasm, denoting poor preparation. Furthermore, Blackmore includes few—if any—fluorescence or Nomarski micrographs. This is a pity insofar as both techniques reveal cellular structures at high contrast, including in living material. Except perhaps for their size, the images of mitosis might have been published by E. B. Wilson a century ago.

Oddly, for what is ostensibly a photographic voyage, Green Universe contains a great abundance of text. Whereas some spreads are occupied entirely by a photograph, most of them have a photograph on one page and a swath of text on the other, and quite a few spreads have text on both pages, with photographs relegated to the margins.

The text is not only long, but it is difficult to read: set in a repellant sans-serif font at a size that verges on the microscopic and usually printed in a pastel color on a black background. Accessibility is further diminished by the chapters' comprising dozens of pages while being devoid of headings. Compounding the unfriendliness of the typography is an apparent carelessness of editing. A more careful editor might have found some of the book's mistakes. To pick out a few, the word flagellae is a solecism, malate is not a product of decarboxylation in C₄ photosynthesis, and the formula given for resolution in the light microscope is wrong. More important, a more careful editor would have helped to channel the text, whose page-long paragraphs tend to wander through topics like a child exploring the seashore.

For all this abundance of text, who is the target audience? Green Universe could be written for nonscientists, a suggestion supported by introductory treatments of concepts in biology, such as DNA and mitosis, that are given essentially from first principles. But I worry about such a reader. A painstaking account of DNA comes after a description of synthetic biology. Is it reasonable to expect nonscientists to cope with designer genomes before learning the facts of DNA? Moreover, I estimate the length of the text to be 50,000 words—a substantial number for a book whose large size and glossy pages make even the act of reading a challenge. In fact, the text is a reasonably complete primer on botany, treating the cellular and reproductive structures of many groups of plants in considerable detail, but it presents this complexity with neither diagram nor direct reference to any of the marvelous photographs. Without reference to a diagram, it strains credulity that a nonscientist could follow, for example, the peculiarities of gnetalian sex.

doi:10.1525/bio.2013.63.6.14

Perhaps the intended readers are, after all, botanists. I confess to having been delighted to learn that Welwitschia is the eponym of a nineteenth-century botanist, and I am grateful to be reminded of Isoetes and other wonders of cryptogamic botany that I once studied and had long forgotten. But, alas, for a botanist, the text is too much textbook. Most of the treatment is standard, if not cliché, as the author guides us, branch by branch, to the crowning glory of flowers. I am tired of hearing early-diverged organisms called “primitive.” Maybe their longevity testifies to their perfection. Maybe lineages that branch and branch again are the backward ones, continually getting it wrong and needing a do-over? If the book were written for experts, here and there, the author should have smacked me with an idea.

A reader may ask, “With all those striking photographs, why does this reviewer natter on about the text? Botanist and nonbotanist alike will enjoy the images.” This is true, but also, sadly, a little mindless—rather like the swimsuit issue of a sports magazine, where the quality of articles on the mechanical properties of spandex is beside the point. The photographs in Green Universe could have been more than pretty; they could have been revelatory. Instead of offering a disconnected botanical trudge, the text could have concisely annotated and explained the images, perhaps with the occasional companion diagram. Conceivably, Blakemore feels that the images should speak for themselves. Fine—let them: Replace the thick text with short passages, just a few pages in length, interspersed among major groupings of images.

In summary, Green Universe comprises two fine books, forced to marry. One is a textbook on botany, an authoritative account of the major groups of plants, written from an evolutionary perspective. The other is an album of remarkable images. Each book on its own could be splendid; joined, they throw pots at each other. A chance was missed here to introduce readers to the plant panoply. The need for such an introduction is pressing as humans abandon strolling in the woods in favor of scrolling down Web pages. The photographs in this book do invite the reader to admire the plant kingdom. However, we need to learn something about those cells with their bright colors and intricate shapes; otherwise, we can only ogle.

TOBIAS I. BASKIN

Tobias I. Baskin (baskin@bio.umass.edu) is a professor in the Biology Department at the University of Massachusetts, in Amherst.

NEW TITLES

Bioluminescence: Living Lights, Lights for Living. Thérèse Wilson and J. Woodland Hastings. Harvard University Press, 2013. 208 pp., illus. $45.00 (ISBN 9780674067165 cloth).

Coastal Erosion and Protection in Europe. Enzo Pranzini and Allan Williams, eds. Taylor and Francis (Routledge), 2013. 488 pp., illus. $195.00 (ISBN 9781849713399 cloth).

Does Science Need a Global Language? English and the Future of Research. Scott L. Montgomery. University of Chicago Press, 2013. 240 pp., illus. $22.50 (ISBN 9780226535036 cloth).

Evolution's Empress: Darwinian Perspectives on the Nature of Women. Maryanne L. Fisher, Justin R. Garcia, and Rosemarie Sokol Chang, eds. Oxford University Press, 2013, 512 pp., illus. $85.00 (ISBN 9780199892747 cloth).

Fatal Flaws: How a Misfolded Protein Baffled Scientists and Changed the Way We Look at the Brain. Jay Ingram. Yale University Press, 2013. 286 pp., illus. $30.00 (ISBN 9780300189896 cloth).

From Pleasure Machines to Moral Communities: An Evolutionary Economics without Homo Economicus. Geoffrey M. Hodgson. University of Chicago Press, 2012. 328 pp., illus. $45.00 (ISBN 9780226922713 cloth).

Genetic Explanations: Sense and Nonsense. Sheldon Krimsky and Jeremy Gruber, eds. Harvard University Press, 2013. 384 pp., illus. $45.00 (ISBN 9780674064461 cloth).

Investing in Water for a Green Economy: Services, Infrastructure, Politics, and Management. Mike Young and Christine Esau, eds. Taylor and Francis (Routledge), 2013. 296 pp., illus. $65.95 (ISBN 9780415501262 paper).

Overheated: The Human Cost of Climate Change. Andrew T. Guzman. Oxford University Press, 2013. 280 pp., illus. $29.95 (ISBN 9780199933877 cloth).

Paleofantasy: What Evolution Really Tells Us about Sex, Diet, and How We Live. Marlene Zuk. W. W. Norton, 2013. 336 pp., illus. $27.95 (ISBN 9780393081374 cloth).

Randomness in Evolution. John Tyler Bonner. Princeton University Press, 2013. 148 pp., illus. $27.95 (ISBN 9780691157016 cloth).

State of the World 2013: Is Sustainability Still Possible? The Worldwatch Institute. Island Press, 2013. 465 pp., illus. $22.00 (ISBN 9781610914499 paper).

Stung! On Jellyfish Blooms and the Future of the Ocean. Lisa-Ann Gershwin. University of Chicago Press, 2013. 456 pp., illus. $27.50 (ISBN 9780226020105 cloth).

The Unfeathered Bird. Katrina van Grouw. Princeton University Press, 2013. 304 pp., illus. $49.95 (ISBN 9780691151342 cloth).

The Water Footprint of Modern Consumer Society. Arjen Y. Hoekstra. Taylor and Francis (Routledge), 2013. 208 pp., illus. $40.95 (ISBN 9781849714273 paper).

doi:10.1525/bio.2013.63.6.15